WEATHER OF CONCERN

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

A high pressure ridge that rolled over the region yesterday and overnight is now in the Great Basin, but will still help provide mild, dry weather for us today. Friday a weakening weather system will move ashore with variable amounts of cloudiness across the region and a slight chance of some light precipitation across the far northern areas through Friday night. Saturday will most likely be dry and cooler as a stronger off shore weather system begins taking over the regional weather pattern. More light precipitation is expected to develop along the northwest coast Saturday night that will eventually spread slowly inland Sunday to cover an area northwest of a Point Arena to the Mount Shasta line. Precipitation will slowly move further inland Monday and Monday night with wetting amounts (0.10 inch plus) eventually reaching most of the region locations near and west of the Cascade/Sierra crest with lighter amounts east of the crest. Unsettled, wet weather will likely continue next Tuesday and Wednesday. Afternoon highs around 80 are expected again today and Friday for the warmest inland areas then cool to below normal values into the mid and upper 60s early next week. Winds will generally be northerly and light into early Friday with mostly southerly winds developing Friday through the weekend at seasonably average speeds.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Offshore flow resulted in a very warm night for many areas of Southern California with overnight lows in the 70s across the foothills and valleys of Southern California. Relative humidity (RH) recovery was minimal and readings are in the teens across several areas from Ventura County southward. The strongest winds early this morning are in Ventura and northern Los Angeles County and in areas just west of the Banning Pass where gusts over 40 mph are occurring. Expect wind speeds to remain about the same through the morning hours before decreasing somewhat during the late afternoon. Temperatures will be near record high readings in 90s across most coastal and valley areas close to 100 in the L.A. Basin. Minimum RH will be in the single digits over most of Southern California this afternoon. Elsewhere, expect gusty north winds of 15-25 mph through the morning along the Colorado River Valley. Winds will remain offshore tonight, but wind speeds will be significantly weaker. The offshore flow will gradually come to an end for most areas Friday afternoon which will allow a weak sea breeze to bring some cooling to the coastal areas. It will still remain very warm inland on Friday, but by Saturday and Sunday, expect temperatures to fall back into the 80s in the valleys and lower foothills. The offshore flow and stable air will keep the San Joaquin Valley relatively cool with widespread night through morning fog today through Saturday. A very weak front may produce some light showers from Kern County southward Sunday afternoon through Monday morning. Expect temperatures to return to near normal readings by early next week. Temperatures may warm slightly next Tuesday or Wednesday, but a deeper trough may bring a good chance of rain along with cooler temperatures next Thursday. No periods of offshore winds are expected next week.
